“A Transportable/Transnational Cinema: The Wapikoni Mobile”
[Un cinéma transnational/transportable : le Wapikoni Mobile]

The Wapikoni Mobile was created in 2004 to provide Indigenous youth in Québec with access to filmmaking equipment and training. My presentation examines how the Wapikoni promotes radical re-conceptualizations of nationhood by inducing shifts in representation, perception and communication that fundamentally redefine intercultural relationships via practical and thematic approaches to transportation. Placing emphasis on the significance of the geopolitical and cultural context and on Québec's historical ambiguity as a conquered settler colonial nation, it investigates the ways in which the Wapikoni influences impressions of national space, borders, and land, whether through links to earlier Indigenous cinematic provocations, consequent global interconnections, or synergy with contemporary political and cultural movements.

Le Wapikoni Mobile a été créé en 2004 pour donner aux jeunes des Premières Nations du Québec l’accès à de l’équipement et à de la formation en production cinématographique. Ma présentation examine comment le Wapikoni Mobile fait la promotion de re-conceptualisations radicales de l’identité nationale en initiant des changements en termes de représentation, de perception et de communication, lesquels redéfinissent les relations interculturelles au moyen d’approches pratiques et thématiques du transport. Mettant l’accent sur la signification du contexte géopolitique et culturel ainsi que sur l’ambiguïté historique du Québec en tant que nation coloniale conquise, ma communication explore comment le Wapikoni peut influencer les perceptions de l’espace national, des frontières et du territoire, que ce soit en établissant des liens avec d’anciens films provocateurs issus des Premières Nations et, par la suite, avec des productions mondiales ou en synergie avec des mouvements politiques et culturels contemporains.

“The Tax Shelter Project”
(Jonathan Culp, 100 min.)
Presented in conjunction with the Niagara Artists Centre

Six years in the making, this groundbreaking feature collage narrative is made entirely from over 400 Canadian films of the 1970s and 1980s. These were the infamous ‘tax shelter’ years, when nation-building and avant-garde cultural movements duked it out with the vulgar capitalist ambitions of policy hacks and genre pros. Niagara born, Toronto based filmmaker Jonathan Culp re-imagines this much-maligned and little-seen era in narrative form. Using a deep diachronic collage format – no original voiceover or subtitles augment the found materials – his video tells a story of aliens invading Canada and turning people’s everyday lives into cinema. Slated for a fall premiere and national tour, FSAC presents the first-ever sneak preview screening of this important work.

Through extrapolation, science fiction offers us imaginary worlds clearly different from (even if continuous with) our own, fantastic worlds that inevitably return us the known world for comparison. If this dynamic of “cognitive estrangement,” as Darko Suvin and others have called it, is central to science fiction, then theoretically it is an ideal genre for experimenting with narrative form, which orders the diegetic world presented in any given text. Although science fiction films have generally been designed in the classic narrative style, indeed most in a way that formalist theorists such as David Bordwell would label merely average and “excessively obvious,” some science fiction films, even those within the commercial mainstream, challenge classic narrative construction in significant ways. Moreover, they do so in a manner that helps shape their thematic concerns. Indeed, throughout the genre’s history science fiction films of different types have taken bold formal liberties, opening up the conventionally comfortable spectatorial position of classic narrative cinema, challenging both the viewer and the classic narrative paradigm itself. I will look closely at several of these films, exploring the aesthetic and thematic implications of their variations of classical norms and what they suggest about the science fiction genre itself.

Par l’extrapolation, la science-fiction nous propose des mondes imaginaires qui sont nettement différents du nôtre (quoique en continuité avec lui), des mondes fantastiques qui nous renvoient inévitablement à l’univers connu de la comparaison. Si cette dynamique de « désunion cognitive », comme l’ont nommée Darko Suvin et d’autres, est au cœur de la science-fiction, ce serait donc, en principe, un genre idéal pour expérimenter la forme narrative régissant le monde diégétique présenté dans tout texte. Bien que les films de science-fiction aient généralement été conçus dans le style narratif classique – en fait, la conception de la plupart d’entre eux serait, comme l’avancent des théoriciens formalistes comme David Bordwell, tout simplement ordinaire et « excessivement évidente » –, certains films de science-fiction, même ceux du genre commercial, mettent en cause la construction narrative classique de manières significatives. De plus, leur manière de faire contribue à donner forme à leurs enjeux thématiques. En fait, durant toute son histoire, le cinéma de science-fiction de différents types s’est permis des libertés formelles audacieuses qui ont ouvert la position conventionnellement confortable du spectateur dans le cinéma narratif classique, pour se jouer du spectateur et du paradigme narratif classique en soi. J’analyserai plusieurs de ces films, en explorant les implications esthétiques et thématiques de leurs variations sur des normes classiques ainsi que ce qu’elles nous disent sur la science-fiction comme genre.

The internet has transformed the documentary. So, too, documentarians are reinventing the language of storytelling on the web. Director Katerina Cizek goes under the hood of three distinct multi-award winning projects within the Highrise story universe to explore a new kind of documentary practice. Highrise is an Emmy-winning interactive documentary at the National Film Board of Canada that explores the human condition of vertical living around the globe.

In this screening and conversation, Cizek is joined by Deborah Cowen, from the Department of Geography at the University of Toronto, who is currently collaborating with Cizek and NFB's HIGHRISE team, exploring 'digital citizenship' in suburbs globally, and Kristine Collins, Director of Education and Institutional Markets at the National Film Board of Canada who works closely with content creators to shape productions for educators and students. This conversation highlights new collaborative ways of working in the documentary genre that combines the expertise of creators, academic researchers, community members, educators and audiences. Join us for an inside look at the creative process behind new immersive online experiences created from a social justice perspective.

L’Internet a transformé le documentaire. De la même manière, les documentaristes réinventent le langage narratif sur le Web. La réalisatrice Katerina Cizek retrace le parcours de trois projets distincts plusieurs fois primés dans le cadre de la série Highrise qui témoigne d’une pratique documentaire interactive d’un nouveau genre. Highrise est un documentaire multimédia de l’Office national du film du Canada lauréat d’un prix Emmy qui explore la condition humaine dans les périphéries verticales des villes du monde entier.

Au cours de cette projection et conversation, Cizek est rejointe par Deborah Cowen, du Département de géographie de la University of Toronto, qui collabore couramment avec Cizek et l’équipe HIGHRISE de l’ONF à l’exploration de la « citoyenneté numérique » dans les banlieues du monde et par Kristine Collins, directrice des Marchés éducatif et institutionnel à l’Office national du film du Canada, qui collabore étroitement avec les créateurs de contenus en vue de donner forme aux productions destinées aux éducateurs et aux étudiants. Cette conversation met en lumière de nouvelles formes collaboratives de travailler dans le genre documentaire qui allie l’expertise de créateurs, chercheurs universitaires, membres de la communauté, éducateurs et public. Rejoignez-nous pour porter un regard de l’intérieur sur le processus créateur sous-jacent à de nouvelles expériences immersives en ligne créées dans un souci de justice sociale.

Abstract: Capitalism has subsumed the entire world. Communication is the form of this subsumption, the vehicle for capitalism’s intensification and expansion. Our setting is thus one of the convergence of communication and capitalism in a formation that incites voice, engagement, and participation only to capture them in the affective networks of mass personalized media. But if the entire communicative field is a domain of production, what happens to exploitation and class struggle? How are these to be conceived? After summarizing the idea of network exploitation (exploitation as rooted in the basic structure of complex networks whereby links follow a powerlaw distribution), this talk will argue that the digital divide be thought as a class divide. Previous approaches to the digital divide as rooted in the privilege of access concealed the ways that gaining access to the internet was like becoming waged. Current emphases on social media occlude the ways that networks enforce class relations: there is no social media; there is only class media. And, ongoing treatment of knowledge workers and the cognitariat too easily adopts Silicon Valley entrepreneurial ideology, failing to grasp the real class division within knowledge work. When current political struggles are recognized as struggles of the knowledge class, not only does this division appear but so do the contradictions and limits of communicative capitalism.

Résumé: Le capitalisme a englobé le monde entier. La communication est la forme que prend cette action englobante, le véhicule de l’intensification et de l’expansion du capitalisme. Notre contexte est donc celui de la convergence de la communication et du capitalisme dans une formation qui encourage la parole, l’engagement et la participation, pour ensuite les enfermer dans les réseaux affectifs des médias de masse personnalisés. Mais si tout le champ communicationnel est un domaine de production, qu’advient-il de l’exploitation et de la lutte des classes? Comment doivent-elles être considérées? Après avoir résumé l’idée de l’exploitation en réseau (une exploitation ancrée dans la structure fondamentale de réseaux complexes dans le cadre desquels les liens suivent une distribution de la loi de puissance), cette présentation soutiendra que le fossé numérique doit être pensé comme un fossé des classes. Les façons précédentes d’aborder le fossé numérique, qui le considéraient comme étant ancré dans le privilège de l’accès, dissimulaient les manières par lesquelles accéder à Internet s’apparentait à devenir salarié ou salariée. L’insistance actuellement mise sur les médias sociaux obstrue les manières par lesquelles les réseaux renforcent les relations de classe : il n’y a pas de médias sociaux, il n’y a que des médias de classe. De plus, le traitement constant réservé aux travailleurs du savoir et au cognitariat adopte trop facilement l’idéologie entrepreneuriale de la Silicon Valley, sans comprendre la division réelle des classes au sein du travail du savoir. Lorsque les luttes politiques actuelles sont reconnues comme étant des luttes de la classe du savoir, non seulement cette division apparaît-elle, mais apparaissent aussi les contradictions et les limites du capitalisme communicationnel.
